"The Sacramentality of Buildings: Fulton Sheen on Sacred Architecture"

*Excerpts from Word on Fire's Article

In his book, Thoughts For Daily Living, originally written in 1956, Sheen discusses two important points regarding Sacred Architecture: 1) the philosophy behind architecture and 2) the sacramentality of architecture. He writes "Architecture is a reflection of a philosophy of life." This short quote gets to the heart of all architecture, particularly church architecture: "Every church is meant to be a microcosm of the heavenly Jerusalem."

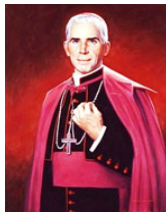

Continuing, Sheen explains the view of the modern world and its effect on architecture: "The basic philosophy of the contemporary world is materialism, or the denial of the spirit. But if there is no world above that which can be seen, touched and scientifically analyzed, then there never can be ornamentation, for ornamentation is symbolism or the communication of the nonmaterial through the material. Ornamentation implies another world beyond this." [In other words,] one's philosophy or way of thinking is the basis for architecture.

In the previous quote, Sheen is also hinting at the sacramentality of architecture. In These Are the Sacraments, Sheen writes that "A sacrament, in a very broad sense of the term, combines two elements: one visible, the other invisible—one that can be seen, or tasted, or touched, or heard; the other unseen to the eyes of the flesh. . . . A spoken word is a kind of sacrament, because there is something material or audible about it; there is something spiritual about it, namely, its meaning." A sacrament, therefore, broadly understood is something physical that makes present some invisible spiritual reality.

Apply this sacramental principle to architecture, and it means that an office is meant to look like an office and a church to look like a church.

While discussing the sacramentality of buildings, Sheen writes about the sacramentality of the church building, particularly the cathedral: "The world is a great sacrament and the cathedral is a still greater one. Our Lord, when He sent out His Apostles to teach, did not say 'Preach the Gospel to every man,' but 'Preach the Gospel to every creature.' The architects of the cathedrals again took Him at His word and brought every creature into their structures; there are trees and flowers and birds and fishes." Sheen is here writing on the cosmological aspect of church architecture. All the statues and mosaics of angels, saints, and nature represent the angels, saints, and nature that give praise to God in the heavenly Jerusalem.

For Sheen, architecture, especially sacred architecture, speaks volumes to the human race. He believed that sacred architecture was even spoken of in the Gospels, writing: "Our Lord on the occasion of His triumphant entrance into Jerusalem said that if men held their praise from Him, the very "stones would cry out"—which they did indeed in Gothic cathedrals."
